"Jo Boats."

Many of our cities have their own peculiar characteristics. Pittsburgh's consists of a curious little community who live in what are called "jo boats." A jo boat is an old barge or flatboat, no longer useful for carrying coal, which has built upon it a kind of house, like an enlarged freight car, that serves as a human habitation. In the old times jo boatmen were peddlers, and carried stock of dry goods, tin-ware and notions up and down the river, stopping for a hail from either bank, and selling, buying, and swapping everything that came to hand; but railroads and steamboats took their occupation away, and jo boatmen have fallen. Now they mostly toil not, but they steal odds and ends, pick up unconsidered coal from about the river, and lead the most shiftless, worthless and disreputable lives. The boats are knocking about in the water and mud, and sometimes half on dry land, and are dirty and comfortless, but they furnish roofs, such as they are, the dingy decks make play-grounds for the children, and they are free from visits for rent and tax collectors.
